White Hat

Lining up for tickets at Detroit Metro.

Soviet Jewish youngster. Esther Ingber, who will be bat mitzvah next October, has already begun writing her Soviet Jewish twin.

Mrs. Ingber explained her reasons for going to Washington: "I didn't want to be part of the generation that didn't do anything. I think most of the people here my age feel that way." Her husband Paul had suffered a broken leg recently, and stayed back in Detroit with their 8-year-old son.

While she talked, chartered Maryland busses sped past the Michigan convoy on the Washington Parkway, carrying demonstrators to the Ellipse in front of the White House. On the way, we drove by the U.S. Customs Service, advertising its current exhibition on "The USSR: Individual: Family: Society."

NOON As one of the first contingents from Michigan to arrive at the Ellipse in front of the White House, it was left to us to discover area 4 which had been designated for the Michigan delegation. Parade marshalls helped with that task, distributed buttons proclaiming "I Went to the Summit for Soviet Jews," pointed out the line of portable toilets on the edge of the Ellipse, and distributed printed signs for the marchers to hold.

Several intrepid demonstrators took the hour of waiting time before the march began, and two hours before the scheduled speeches, to head for the National Gallery and the Georgia O'Keefe exhibition, telephone friends in the D.C. area, or seek out acquaintances in other state delegations on the Ellipse.

Seeing the Detroiters' white hats and the small but tall Michigan sign being carried by Aaron Lerner, strangers would come up to ask, "Are you from Detroit? Do you know so-and-so?" Lerner was asked if he was chosen to carry the sign because of his height. "No," answered the 6-foot-6 Detroiter. "I just happened to be one of the first ones here." Lerner managed to keep the sign high above the crowd throughout the day, and his sign and the white Detroit hats were a key benchmark to keep the Michigan delegation together.

Stanford Lehne found the Michigan sign on the Ellipse. A retired engineer, he drove from Detroit on Saturday "as the least expensive way to go." He came to the rally because "there are human rights problems all over, but this is a critical issue. We all have just one life to lead, and if we don't do something now ..."

12:55 p.m. One of the few serious incidents of the day occurred during the singing and socializing on the Ellipse. Avishai Zelinger, 11 1/2, who traveled by bus with his mother and sisters from Ann Arbor, collapsed. A doctor aided the youngster while bystanders hopped the fence into the media section and called for an ambulance.

Avisahi spent an hour at the hospital, and returned to the rally with his mother, Sandra, and went home with the Ann Arbor contingent. Mrs. Zelinger said this week that he is being checked by his doctor, and she thanks the bystanders who helped her son.

1:20 p.m. "What I want to know is how Gorbachev feels about all this," said Elana Nachman, one of 11 Hillel
